Not illustrated. 1917 Excerpt: .benefit could be derived from any addition of salts in definite proportions the soil solutions were treated with the 36 different combination of three salts, these three salts being KH.PO<sub>4</sub>, Ca(NO<sub>3</sub>)<sub>2</sub>, and MgSO<sub>4</sub>. By this method it would seem to be possible to determine what a particular soil lacks, and what treatment it needs to improve it. Below is reported very briefly the results obtained with a solution extracted from an infertile soil and another solution pressed from a fertile soil. To the different soil solutions was added the three salts in the various ratios as described above. As indicators to determine the relative values of the various cultures, seedlings of winter wheat were used. At the same time that the series on the soil solution of the poor soil was run, there was a similar series made up with distilled water for comparison. After about four weeks growth the plants were harvested and the dry weights determined. The data for the dry weight of tops are mentioned here only. Besides these, data were collected on transpiration, water requirement, evaporating power of the air, and dry weight of roots. In the distilled water series the culture solution which gave the highest dry weight was the solution designated as 523. This means that fivetenths of the total concentration was from the KH.PO, two-tenths from the Ca(NO )<sub>2</sub> and three-tenths from the MgSO<sub>4</sub>. In the case of the cultures made up with the soil solution the best result...
